

Poli Sci 229, 329 (Directed Reading and Research in American Politics), Psych 195 (Special Laboratory Projects), Pub Pol 298 (Directed Readings in Public Policy), Comm 299 (Individual Work) (all students welcome)

The Political Psychology Research Group (PPRG) continues a long tradition of research in political psychology at Stanford University. It strives to be a network of scholars in the Stanford community and to build new connections with other scholars in the field and anyone concerned with the application of scientific knowledge on political psychology. Professors, visiting scholars, PhD candidates, and undergraduate researchers collaborate in our lab to publish research about a variety of topics including attitude formation, change, and effects, on the psychology of political behavior, survey research methods, and public opinion on the environment and climate change. Students enrolled to work with PPRG learn how to be scientists by participating first-hand in projects designed to yield publications in top journals. Students can read about the team by visiting pprg.stanford.edu.